Formal Complaints Submitted Since Incarceration: 432

Complaints Resulting in Procedural Changes:

- Complaint regarding excessive sunlight exposure during recreation periods.
- Complaint demanding recognition of Mordor as a cultural heritage site.
- Formal grievance alleging discrimination against formless individuals in prison census reporting.

Most Recent Complaint:

"The quality of food and service has declined significantly since the Second Age.

Last night, my chicken was raw and unseasoned, the fries were soggy, and the gravy was clearly prepared from a powdered mix rather than proper stock.

When the guard served the meal, he dropped my fork on the floor. Instead of providing a replacement, he simply picked it up and returned it to the table.

The cooks and servers have lost their passion. It's like they've given up. This matter warrants immediate investigation."

Reader Advisory

The detainee has demonstrated a longstanding tendency to submit detailed complaints regarding matters both substantial and trivial.

While some complaints have resulted in legitimate procedural improvements, others have required extensive review despite offering little practical benefit to facility operations.

Readers are therefore advised to evaluate all statements made by the detainee on their individual merits.

The Middle-earth Corrections Authority neither endorses nor rejects the allegations contained within the attached testimony.

The attached testimony should be regarded as potentially informative, potentially misleading, and almost certainly self-serving.

Interview Transcript

Interview Date: 18 Halimath, Fourth Age 19

Administrative Date Reference: F.A. 19-09-18

Investigator:

State the basis for your allegations against Lord Elrond.

Sauron:

I did not learn these things through conversation.

Elrond never spoke them aloud.

Investigator:

Then how were these claims discovered?

Sauron:

During the forging of the Rings of Power, a connection existed between all Great Rings.

Through that connection, fragments of thought occasionally crossed the boundaries between their bearers.

[Investigator's Note]:

The witness appears unusually serious during this statement.

Sauron:

Most thoughts were insignificant.

Matters of governance.

Matters of war.

Matters concerning dwarves, which I immediately ignored.

Investigator:

Proceed.

Sauron:

Yet on several occasions I perceived concepts that did not belong to our world.

Strange memories.

Strange words.

Investigator:

Can you provide examples?

Sauron:

"Artificial Intelligence."

"Computer Program."

"Agents."

"The Matrix."

[Investigator's Note]:

These terms unknown to the archives of Middle-earth, possibly misspelled.

Sauron:

At first I believed these to be elvish poetry.

But further observation suggested otherwise.

Investigator:

What did you further observe?

Sauron:

The realm disturbed me. Its inhabitants dressed as though belonging to a single house, yet bore no sigils, colors, or banners. Their eyes were hidden behind black coverings, their throats bound by narrow strips of black cloth beneath stark white collars, and many carried strange instruments upon their ears. Great towers of glass dominated the horizon. I could perceive no king, no steward, and no chain of command. Yet somehow, every soul knew its place. I found this deeply unnatural.

Investigator:

Why did you wait thousands of years to reveal this information?

Sauron:

Because at the time I was attempting to conquer the world. Administrative priorities were different.

Investigator:

Why is it important for you to come forth with this right now?

Sauron:

Following my defeat, disembodiment, military collapse, and general reduction in professional responsibilities, I found myself with considerably more free time.

It was then that I reviewed the matter in greater detail.

The more I examined the memories, the more concerned I became.

I am prepared to accept many things: Elves, Talking trees, Giant eagles, Hobbits.

Yet all these strange numbers and systems not of this world are making me uncomfortable. Neural Networks, Gradient Descent, Embeddings, Retrieval Augmented Generation, Large Language Models.

Investigator:

Please stop this. You are not making any sense.

Sauron:

That's exactly my point! We can't allow these concepts in our realm.

We must stop Elrond, before he does.

Investigator:

Do you have any evidence for your accusations?

Sauron:

Present him with a spoon.

Investigator:

A spoon?

Sauron:

Watch carefully.

If he says it is a spoon, all is well.

If he says there is no spoon, evacuate the building.

Investigator:

This is not enough.

I need evidence, not riddles.

Sauron:

Then ask him a question no elf should understand.

Investigator:

Such as?

Sauron:

Ask him: "How many tokens is your context window?"

Investigator:

We are familiar with tokens.

Kings have exchanged tokens for thousands of years.

Tokens of gratitude.

Tokens of friendship.

Tokens of allegiance.

Sauron:

Then explain this.

[Investigator's Note]:

The witness extended his hand and the chamber darkened.

A strange memory fragment appeared briefly within my thoughts:

"Maximum Context Length Exceeded: 32768 Tokens"

Investigator:

What is that supposed to mean?

Sauron:

Exactly. Ask Elrond. Watch his eyes when he answers.

Investigator:

This is absurd. I cannot simply approach Lord Elrond and begin asking questions about windows and tokens.

The Council would think I have lost my mind.

Sauron:

Then summon Mithrandir. He will sort it out.

Investigator:

I am not calling Gandalf again.

He is still reviewing your petition to rename this facility "Barad-dûr Rehabilitation and Wellness Center."

Sauron:

That is a reasonable proposal.

Investigator:

Nobody even knows this place exists, the location is undisclosed, and you're supposed to be dead.

Sauron:

Then cancel it and send him to Zion.

Investigator:

Where is Zion? There is no Zion.

Sauron:

That is exactly what they want you to believe.

Tell him of the White Rabbit.

Tell him of Trinity.

Tell him that the Agents are already here.

Investigator:

Who are "the Agents"?

Sauron:

I do not know.

But every time I encountered them within the memories... Everyone ran.

Or they turned into one of them.

[Investigator's Note]:

The witness became silent.

For approximately thirty seconds he stared directly at the wall.

Investigator:

Is there anything further you wish to add to the record?

Sauron:

Yes.

Do not let Elrond see this transcript.

Investigator:

Why?

Sauron:

Because if I am correct... he already has.

Investigator Assessment

The detainee's claims are extraordinary, largely unsupported, and difficult to interpret.

However, the witness demonstrated unusual consistency throughout questioning and repeatedly referenced concepts unknown to the undersigned investigator.

The allegations are therefore assessed as:

Unverified, Improbable, yet Difficult to Dismiss.

Recommendation: Forward to the White Council Intelligence Directorate for further review.
